Josh Quittner

Editor-at-Large

Josh Quittner, editor-at-large for TIME, covers consumer technology in the magazine, and he also writes a technology blog for TIME.com. Additionally, Quittner writes reviews of new products as well as technology-focused features.

Quittner has a long history at Time Inc. Most recently, he was the managing editor of Business 2.0 and a writer for FORTUNE. He first had a byline in TIME in 1994 as a staff writer covering technology, back at the very beginning of the Internet. While at TIME, Quittner launched “The Netly News,” first as a website on Time Inc.'s Pathfinder and later as a column in the magazine. He subsequently served as editor of TIME.com's "twice" as well as tech editor of TIME before moving to San Francisco in 2002 to work for Business 2.0.

Prior to coming to Time Inc., Quittner worked at Newsday in the early '90s, where he wrote a pioneering column called “Life in Cyberspace.”

Quittner received an M.S. in Journalism from Columbia University and is based in San Francisco with his wife, journalist Michelle Slatalla (with whom he has co-written five books), and their three daughters.
